

ABSTRACT

According to one embodiment, a method of managing power generated within a computer system, the method includes operating the computer system at a first central processing unit (CPU). Subsequently, a first signal generated by a thermal sensor within the first CPU is received and operation of the computer system at is resumed at a second CPU.